Tilghman Lee recalls that this house was a frame house, two stories in height. Like other frame houses in Sugarland, it was sheathed with weatherboards that were whitewashed.

Lee says that it was built after the log houses because Branison was younger and wanted to build his house in the "higher style", which was frame instead of log.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

This house was representative of the house built by Black landowners of the last decades of the 19th century. Tilghman Lee's explanation that this house was frame, instead of log, because frame houses were considered more in keeping with the styles of the time is supported by the testimony of other Black informants in the country, such as Lemuel Graham in Martinsburg.

The U.S. Census for Montgomery County for 1880 lists John Branison (sic) with wife Mary. He was born in 1850, and she in 1854. Her occupation was "keeping house", while his was "work on farm". Tilghman Lee confirms that John Branison's wife was named Mary. Branison's children were:

Arthur, age 10
 Sarah, age 9
 Anna, age 6
 Ida, age 5
 Mamie, age 3
 Hattie, age 1
 Henrietta, age 1

Tilghman Lee remembers that two of the Branison children were named Arthur and Mamie, so this is the Sugarland family.

According to deed EBP 29/76, John Branison purchased this tract of 11 acres in 1880 from A. Pleasants Webb and Anne A. Webb, and the Sitlers. Thus this is one of the older generation of houses, nearly contemporary to the William Taylor house. In order for Branison to build a frame house at this time instead of the more commonplace log dwelling, his family must have been somewhat better off economically or been more concerned about investing their money in a house of the newer style.
